Excerpt: .and by their relative bearing promote enjoyment. We observe the charming landscape in which the variegated hues of the waving foliage vie with the blooming tints of the flowers, which together arouse the sensitive fancy; and, as the eye wanders from the vale with its emerald green to the mountains clad with varying colors, all the intervening scene transports and charms. Again, as we view the rising sun, as his mild radiance lights up hill and dale with enlivening beams, as we follow his apparent course to midday and his decline, when in the western horizon he sinks behind his golden canopy, to be succeeded by the silvery moon, which, moving in silent grandeur, chases away the lowering gloom of darkness; each of these phases of the day and night add suggestions of wonder and delight; while, through the senses into the mind, come almost imperceptibly ideas too transcendant for utterance. In all of the phenomena of nature we recognize such manifestations as are inherently real and in accordance with the harmonious relations existing in all material forms. And when, in the domain of fine arts, man attempts to transfer to the canvass, or to place in durable material the images to him appearing, in such degree as these artistic delineations correspond to nature, to that extent do they raise in the beholder correspondingly pleasing emotions. Again, as the elements are in conflict, when the tornado sweeps over the earth, when the rushing torrent...
